'Genetic counseling, in the form of "hereditary counseling," was one of the earliest uses of human genetics in clinical medical practice. At first, such counseling was limited in scope, with counselors only able to provide clients with information about genetic defects after the birth of the affected child. With recent rapid advances in knowledge about genetic diseases, and the advent of carrier detection and prenatal diagnosis, however, genetic counseling has become a more precise and extensively used clinical service. This book presents a series of critical inquiries into the conceptual problems and policy issues raised by current practices in genetic counseling. An introduction by F. Clarke Fraser first sketches the scientific and clinical contours that have shaped the development of applied human genetics. Part I presents key concepts in medical genetics {Arthur Caplan}, genetic disease {Marc Lappé, Richard Roblin, Richard T. Hull} and genetic health {Robert F. Murray, Jr.}. Part II"

"It is of interest that 3 possible impediments to writing DNR orders were never cited by our attending physicians as reasons for not writing a DNR order: the morality of DNR orders, discomfort discussing end-of-life issues, and the threat of litigation. There are authors who believe that each of these potential barriers plays a significant role as an impediment to writing the DNR order. For example, Hull 30 believes that the statement of the American Thoracic Society Bioethics Task Force on withholding and withdrawing life-sustaining therapy endorses suicide, "as it enjoins physicians to help a patient forego life-support by providing drugs in quantities sufficient to relieve suffering even if they hasten death." Staff physicians at our medical center are not required to pursue treatment plans that contradict their beliefs, and Hull's moral stance is not supported by the practices of our attending physicians."

- 2006 Sarah Breier-Mackie, "Medical Ethics and Nursing Ethics: Is There Really Any Difference?" Gastroenterology Nursing 29(2) (March/April): 182-183). "Another interesting exploration into what sets nursing apart from medicine when it comes to patient interaction is in the word "nursing" itself. Hull (1980) reminds us that nursing has a resemblance with the maternal functions of nurturing, educating, and caring for the young. The idiom originates from the Latin word nutrio, meaning "to nurture." Thus, nursing is akin to mothering in that it fosters education, growth, and protection of those in childlike states where they are unable to provide for their own care. In contrast, medicine is not focused on nurturing, but rather on combating illness, malfunction, and injury. The root term here is the Latin word medicus that refers to the science and art of diagnosing, treating, and preventing disease and injury. Its goals are to help people live longer, happier, and more active lives with less suffering and disability. Medical discourse also embraces warlike terms that are commonplace, such as combat, struggle, defeat, and fighting. Essentially, the ethos of medicine is to struggle against an enemy, that is, to fight illness. As Hull (1980) eloquently proclaims, "The nurse and the physician are primitive mother and father, nurturing children and protecting them from the enemy" (p. 51). In determining whether these differences render different ethics, the following fundamental argument is offered: Compassion and support are primary virtues in nursing, whereas authority, courage, sanction, and risk-taking are those of medicine. Yet despite these differences that impact upon medical and nursing ethics, there must be the recognition of an essential integration of healing and nurturing or curing and caring, for they are, after all, inseparable."

- 2008 Aaron E. Hinkley, "Metaphysical Problems in the Philosophy of Medicine and Bioethics," Journal of Medicine and Philosophy, 33: 101-105. "The final paper in this issue of The Journal of Medicine and Philosophy is "The Beginning of Individual Human Personhood" by Paul S. Penner and Richard T. Hull. In this paper, Penner and Hull attempt to establish the point at which a human fetus is sufficiently developed so as to be a fully developed human being and, therefore, to morally prohibit abortion except in certain unusual circumstances. Indeed, the authors point out, "When secularists consider the fact that there is little ethical difference between a human being on the day before its birth and the same human being on the day after its birth, they are confronted with an important question." (p. 2). The authors first begin by examining common approaches to this issue in contemporary bioethical debates. As such they address the issues of consciousness and self-consciousness, which are often ways in which this issue has been addressed. However, the authors ultimately reject these considerations because they ultimately involve the concept of personhood, which is often describe, as the authors point out, as "Being-in-the-World" to use a Heideggerian turn of phrase. This creates further problems since as Penner and Hull note, "Using this as the marker of the turn to personhood, that is, the marker of the creation of a human being from a human organism, could lead a secularist to conclude, as Peter Singer (1993, 181–93) has pointed out, that the destruction of a human organism is ethically permissible for some time after birth since the right to life is grounded in the ability to plan and anticipate one’s future. “ (p. 3). Ultimately, the authors reject this move because self-consciousness, they claim, is ultimately a subjective phenomenon that cannot be objectively, or scientifically, measured by a third party out in the world. Therefore, as a pragmatic consideration, the authors turn to the development of the brain and nervous system as well as sensory organs in the human fetus, which not only can be objectively measured to some degree but also are contributing factors to the eventual development of self-consciousness in the human person. Based on these considerations gleaned from the natural sciences, Penner and Hull ultimately determine that “in order not to destroy a person in the making (as opposed to a ‘ mere ‘ human organism), we should refrain from aborting any fetus later than 23 weeks in the gestation process except under special circumstances. “ (p. 8). So, the authors conclude that third trimester abortions, with some exceptions for special circumstances, are morally impermissible because they kill a developing human person as opposed to a mere human organism.”

Work in Progress

Editor, Presidential Addresses of the American Philosophical Association, 1901–2000, an 11-volume series (commissioned). The American Philosophical Association Board of Officers has accepted my proposal to be Editor in Chief of this series. The series is intended to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the APA, and to be a major resource for 21st-century scholars wishing to work in the history of 20th-century American Philosophy. Each volume will cover a ten year period. For the eleventh volume, scholars will be commissioned to write critical historical essays for each decade, aiming at characterizations of the general philosophical spirit of the decade in which the presidential addresses were given. Each address will be preceded by a photograph of the individual followed by a biographical sketch by the editor. Contract initially with Kluwer Academic Publishers; rights sold to and contracted now with Prometheus Books.

Not yet titled novel, consisting of 9 episodes of dialogues between a bioethics professor and a conservative antiabortion demonstrator. See my blog at <http://www.richard-t-hull.com>, Reflections on Bioethics
